Excerpt from Diagnosis and Treatment of Diseases of the Rectum, Anus, and Contiguous Textures

The upper portion of the rectum is in contact with the sacrum, internal pudic, and sacral plexus, in front with the posterior portion of the bladder in the male, and with the uterus in the female. Sometimes a convolution of the small intestine may intervene. At its commencement the rectum is generally surrounded by the peritoneum, which binds it to the sacrum; but lower down it covers the anterior surface only, and is then reflected on to the bladder, forming the recto-vesical pouch. The uterus and vagina are interposed between it and the bladder in the female. This pouch may extend down to within an inch (centimetres) of the prostate; the distance is liable to variations depending on the age and the distension of neighboring organs. In the newborn it may extend to within an inch (centimetres) of the anus. The distance increases after the fifth year; in old age with enlarged prostate the peritoneum goes still higher up. The distance from the anus to the lower portion of the fold has been a subject of much controversy both at home and abroad. We shall not enter the discussion, but will state that our observations lead us to believe that two and a half inches (centimetres) in the male and three and a half inches (centimetres) in the female, with an additional inch (centimetres) when both bladder and rectum are distended, would be a fair average distance.
