Carrie was a driven artist. She loved to write songs and sing them, one day hoping to hear one of her songs on the radio. The closest that she had gotten so far was the karaoke bar where she worked at night, so her dreams were still far out of reach. Her schooling was almost over and the time to fly was coming, but all that changed when she met a biker at the bar that made her reevaluate her priorities. His touch was far more potent than any song she had written and Carrie finds that her true muse is the man she grips on the back of a motorcycle, hurtling into the unknown.

Castor is head of a local motorcycle gang and when he saw the shooter girl from across the room, he knew he had to have her. He is not like his exterior would suggest though. Castor is polite and gentle when he touches her, though he doesn't seem to need permission to take what he wants, he demands it anyways. When she is then harassed and taken advantage of by a Professor, Castor realizes how much she really means to him. And now he has a mission...
