On March 25, 1911 a tragic fire spread through a garment factory in New York. While trying to escape, many of the workers inside found the doors locked. In order to save their lives, immigrant workers (mostly Jewish and Italian) jumped from the 8th and 9th levels of the building. In this fire an estimated 146 people were killed. Written by Sal Galvan of Long Beach California, "The Triangle Shirtwaist Fire" is a research dissertation that studied the accounts, of the Triangle Shirtwaist Fire. S. Galvan argues that--while the practices of the managers were common of the Gilded Age--the fault of this tragedy still lies on the management for the incineration of 146 adolescents and young adults. The company had a complete disregard for the safety of its workers. On five separate occasions additional fires broke out, and no safety precautions were made for the company. For this and many other reasons Galvan argues that the managers should be held at fault for the slaughter of the civilians.
