Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: ...had been senator from Tennessee twice and had held other public offices, he was considered by the people as entirely different from the officeholding candidates whom he opposed. The election was not decided in November as is usually the case, for no one had a majority of the electoral votes. Jackson received 99, mainly from the South and West, Adams 84, principally from the Northeast, Crawford stood third with 41, and Clay fourth with 37. As the Constitution requires the House of Representatives to select the president from the three candidates having the largest number of votes, whenever the electoral college fails to give any one a majority, Clay held the balance of power. His influence was thrown to Adams, who was, like Clay, a believer in the liberal construction of the Constitution, a protective tariff, and internal improvements. But when Clay was selected as Adams's secretary of state, followers of Jackson cried out that a "corrupt bargain" had been made between Clay and Adams. Jackson never forgave Adams for "cheating " him out of the presidency, and his dislike for Clay was intensified by the latter's preference for his rival. Austere, painstaking, and impartial, Adams made few friends and won over no enemies, by settling all questions and making all appointments on their merits. His personal enemies fought him at every turn in Washington, and the people turned from him and his policy to more popular men John Quincy Adams and measures. The last president of the old regime, Adams failed because the country had outgrown the aristocratic system which he represented and had become democratic. 265. New Political Parties.--The presidential election National of 1824-1825 and the subsequent formation of factions, com-Republicans, posed o...
